PREFACE.

The present undertaking has not been accomplished for the presumptuous purpose of setting aside or excelling the meritorious publications of a similar tendency; on the contrary, the Proprietors candidly acknowledge that it is of a limited nature, not being intended as a work of general reference, but merely for the use of Artists, principally to exhibit specimens, and correct the style of drawing, which has hitherto been executed in an ancient way: indeed the study of Antiquity affords many tests of the rudeness and inaccuracy of the Mottos, Inscriptions, Sculptures, &c. of former times.

The first object of the Proprietors was only a few plates for the use of Artists, Herald Painters, Engravers, and Chasers; but the Subscribers, wishing to make the Volume as complete as possible, requested an Index of Reference to the Names of the Families bearing the Crests; and the Proprietors, desirous of giving every satisfaction, have cheerfully complied with the request.

This Work being for the purpose of elucidating the Crests of Families, as before intimated, these preliminary remarks shall be confined to this part of Heraldry. A Crest is the uppermost part of an Armoury, or that part of the casque, or helmet, next to the mantle. It derives its name from Crista, a cock's comb, as it was supposed to have been originally a projection over the top of some helmets (many of which, however, had none), and it has been supposed by Antiquarians that the first hint of the Crest arose from this projection. The Crest was deemed a greater mark of Nobility than the Armoury; as it was borne at tournaments, to which none were admitted until they had given strong proofs of their magnanimity. Hence, the word Crest is figuratively used for spirit or courage.

The original purpose of a Crest, as some Authors affirm, was to make a commander known to his men in battle; or, if it represented a monster, or other tremendous object, to render him warlike and terrific. But there is no satisfactory proof, whether the Crest was really meant to render a leader easily recognized by his men, to make him look more formidable in battle, or as an ornamental mark of distinction.

Some Writers imagine that Crests were originally plumes of feathers; but, in all probability, these were nothing more than a particular kind of Crest. The earliest Crests with which we are acquainted, were animals of different kinds and their parts, monsters, branches of trees, plumes of hair or feathers, and the like.

The Crest was an honorable emblem of distinction, which frequently characterised the bearer as much as his arms, and was sometimes constituted by Royal Grant. Crests are said to have been of particular use in tilts and joustings, where no shield was borne; for the bearer was thus distinguished who would otherwise have been known by his armorial bearings. We find in the representations of ancient encounters, that the combatants appear with enormous Crests, almost as large as the helmets. Those Knights and Gentlemen, who repaired to tournaments, were distinguished by their Crests. None were deemed worthy of partaking of such fetes who did not bear arms of some kind; unless of undoubted superiority by birth or merit. Crests were likewise embroidered on the vestments of the attendants, at the processions of Parliament, Coronations, and public solemnities: they were also engraven, carved, or printed on property, in the same manner as coats of arms.

According to the general opinion, the Crest was not hereditable, like the arms of a family, and, consequently, every successor might assume a new one. This, however, was not the practice of this kingdom; for it is well known that the Crest of many families, being esteemed as distinctive as the bearings in the shield, has been transmitted from one generation to another for several centuries. The immense variety of Crests has probably arisen from the younger branches of a family retaining the paternal coat, and assuming a different Crest; and this may be the cause for supposing that the Crest may be changed though the arms may not.

Some declare a Crest is a mere ornament, but it has been so much considered a mark of distinction that different Sovereigns have made additions to the Crests of their subjects. Indeed, it was uniformly esteemed an honorable symbol. In addition to Crests being the subject of Royal Grant, there are instances of some having been assumed and confirmed in commemoration of warlike deeds or other honorable events. Some were taken to preserve the fame of a progenitor, whose name implied something martial or illustrious, and others were allusive to dignified offices. Several have been granted for certain services. It appears from ancient monuments, that the Crest consisted of some plain and simple device, or what was applicable to the assumer only; as appears from an eagle's head, a bird's wing, a peacock's tail, a banner, &c. But so great has been the deviation from this practice, that it is impossible to assign any rule for the subsequent assumption of Crests. Many persons of different names bear similar Crests, and as many of the same name bear different ones. Every day we may behold the most uncommon, complicated, and unintelligible Crests, chosen without design or reason.

Women, it is generally asserted, may not bear Crests, because, in ancient times, they could not wear a helmet. We have, however, innumerable instances of women bearing coats armorial; a fact, particularly illustrated by their seals, which are still preserved: and here, undoubtedly, is a gross inconsistency, for a woman was as incapable of using a shield as of bearing a helmet.

The period when Crests were first introduced into Britain cannot be ascertained. We find in a drawing of the thirteenth century, relative to a military encounter of Offa, there is a figure with a kind of Crest on the helmet: and the same figure occurs again in another transaction of that time. The great seal of Richard I. who died A. D. 1199, first represents the English King with something on his helmet resembling a plume of feathers. After this reign most of the English Kings had crowns on their helmets. On that of Richard II. prior to the year 1377, is a lion on a cap of state. On the helmet of Henry IV. is his Crest, as also on the head of his horse.

Alexander III., who began to reign 1249, is the first of the Scottish Kings who appears with a Crest: he has a flat helmet with a square grated visor, and a Crest consisting of a plume of feathers; a plume is likewise on the head of the horse. The helmet of Robert I. who began to reign in 1306, is found with a triangular grated visor, a crown above it, and plumes on the horse's head. Ornaments are on the head of Edward Baliol's horse, nearly of the same period. The visor of David, the successor of Robert, is in front, but no crest on the helmet, nor have the two succeeding Kings any. James I., in the beginning of the fifteenth century, has a lion on his helmet for a Crest.

At the time the Royal Seal exhibited no Crest, they were common on those of subjects. It is affirmed that, before the year 1286, the Crest, accompanied by the mantlings and wreath was known in England. In 1292 there is a seal of Hugh le Despencer, with a warlike figure on the helmet and horse's head. These figures are frequently to be met with in the thirteenth century; but what they represented, or what their utility was, is doubtful. There is a dragon on the helmet of Thomas Earl of Lancaster who was beheaded A. D. 1322. On the reverse is a swan above the shield, just where a Crest should be, on the one, and on the other a lion; but whether they were designed for Crests, or for figures on which the shield was hung, as was then usual, cannot be positively said; for it was sometimes suspended from an eagle's back, around the neck, or hung on a tree.

The same may be said of Scottish Crests; though none are on the great seal, they are frequent on those of subjects. There is a writing of great importance, dated 1371, to which many seals are affixed, and most of them have a Crest. On a seal of the Earl of Strathern, attached to a writing, 1320, is a shield placed between eagles, so that the head of the bird appears above, like a Crest. The helmet of Robert, Governor of Scotland, bears a lion, 1413; and the same is on that of Murdac, his successor, both being Crests.

The chief sources from which Heraldic instruction is to be derived are the seals which are appendages to ancient writings, illuminated manuscripts, tombs and buildings. Seals are the most authentic, but proper illuminations probably afforded better illustrations, because seals bear the armour only in a particular character. It is also very probable that the same seal hath served for several generations. Indeed, one of the most useful purposes to which both Crests and armorial shields were applied, was in the seals affixed to written instruments, as already intimated.

To a volume limited like the present, further preliminary observations would be superfluous: we shall therefore close this brief introduction with reminding the reader, that it is only intended to improve the style of drawing from antique subjects, and the Proprietors flatter themselves that the superiority and execution of the plates will be a sufficient recommendation to the Public. Indeed, it is on their masterly excellence that they rest their most sanguine expectations, and doubt not but Herald Painters, Engravers, and Chasers, will find this Work of infinite utility.
